Love Of Money As Innate Human Need

December 30, 2021

Love of money? This resource has become a symbol of personal self-affirmation and self-exaltation against the background of others.

We Know Why People Have Love Of Money

Of course, people become rich not only by honest means. Some people have much more love of money, than the others. Each person believes that he is right in his own way and has the right to do what he wants. Therefore, people may consider money as a success and something extremely important in their life. The others are not a fans of money, but consider it as a resource.

The first group of people think, that all the poor people always look with envy or respect at the rich. They also may think, that poor people are ready to betray others in exchange for the rich man's money. But another group of people has the opposite thinking and believes that they don't care about rich. They prefer to look for more "alive" and understandable qualities, besides their love of money.

But Which Groups Of People Have Like Money Most In Typology

According to our analysis, among the eight innate groups of people there is a certain hierarchy. Here is an analytical table of these groups that show that some people have much more love of money than other people. The first places are those groups, who think most about money and have a monetary fanaticism:

1. The Cognitive

This group leads the world today in terms of the number of wealthy people. They often think about money and quickly conquer the market, earning income. They usually do not have any shame to use a variety of methods and ways of getting rich. If there are any rules and principles, the Cognitives consider it only as an obstacle that you can bypass. These people separate the hierarchy from business, as well as the state from business. This creates a completely democratic market, free from bureaucracy, any rules and business ethics. But they have no sense of proportion in personal enrichment.

2. Ethnos

The second place in the list of the rich. They have something in common with the Cognitive group in terms of making money and doing business. But unlike them, such people are often hard physical workers. In addition to their hard work, they do not hesitate to look for various connections. They use these channels for enrichment and can bypass the rules created by someone. Therefore, they can use different ways to make money, ignoring some principles. They also have no sense of proportion in personal enrichment.

3. Patrons

They also have no sense of proportion in personal enrichment. They do not know how to run an independent business. They prefer to work for someone. But they will choose those boses, who will give them a huge salary. They can also work on various jobs to earn extra money. They don't want to stay on the same level, that is why they go to casinos and play gambling and lotteries. Patrons believe that they can win a jackpot. In order for their values to be active, they always need a lot of money.

4. Marxists

These guys have a dream of being landowners. Therefore they have no sense of proportion in personal enrichment. They can be physical laborers when forced to work in businesses, farms or factories. They, like Patrons, do not know how to run an independent business. That is why they prefer to work for the owner of the enterprise.

It is desirable that these enterprises, where they will have to work, be state-owned. Marxists like to make various contributions to the state treasury. They are confident that by paying these contributions, they will be able to occupy a higher position in society. Therefore, they see money as the main need for survival in the world of hierarchy.

5. Pharaohs

They need some prestige, good income, but at the same time they know the measure of personal enrichment. Such people prefer only official labor, transparent and legal business. These people do not suffer from fanaticism from the very fact of having money. They see a good only in personal PR, hobbies, career growth and business. Also they would like to live in the prosperous city or country.

Money for them is just an investment to achieve personal goals. When the goal is achieved, they can stop accumulating money or switch to another important goal. These people prefer mental work with a high salary. They do not like any parallel part-time jobs. In business they create rules that everyone, in their opinion, should follow.

6. Pilgrims

They are travelers and patrons of small businesses and street trading. Many of them trade on their own. They try to look for easy money and try various methods of enrichment. During this process, they enjoy their own actions and process. But like the Pharaohs, they know the measure of personal enrichment. Moreover, they reasonably relate to money and other rich people in general.

Sometimes they try to accumulate money for a certain period of time or invest it in something, since they do not really like working and being dependent on someone.

7. Toastmaster

Money is not important for them. They value only their children and strong family relationships. Being conscious people, they understand that while working a lot for someone, they will not have time for their family. Therefore, work and business is not for their lifestyle.

They are ready to do business and work only for the purpose of feeding their family. These people would like to continue to live modestly as a nomads. But civilization demands that they should have something material.

8. Virtues

They are local patriots who are ready to work and help their neighbors. These people are generous, love to create something from small, and share it with their country. They like some small manual labor. Virtues never had a need for money, since they grow their own products and do not need someone else's help.

Therefore are not interested in big salaries or business, since they get almost everything they need from nature, their lifestyle and work. They are always ready to donate the result of their labor to their country. They are not interested in any new items and have no need for a luxurious life.

Conclusion:

First 4 innate groups of people have a dependence on money and a love of money. The other 4 groups do not see anything extra valuable in money and treat them calmly. Thus, the groups of Marxists and Pharaohs are the most balanced in terms of lifestyle and money management. This is because they invest their money not only in the state, their own or someone else's business, but also a little in themselves.
